

I would like to state my opinion on GN Docket No. 13-86. I would strongly encourage the FCC to maintain the current broadcast indecency policies. While it sounds like the FCC does not have resources to investigate all of the complaints submitted I do not think that lowering the standards is the proper way to deal with this problem. While some broadcasts may not be punished for violating the indecency policies it seems that the more egregious violations are being punished. All public broadcasters should be inclined to self-police their programming if, for no other reason, than to avoid the possibility of hefty fines.

I appreciate the efforts of the FCC to keep nudity and profanity off public television where it could easily be viewed by children. I personally do not want to be exposed to it either and appreciate the current limitations. Thank you,

- Jordan Squire